If Robots Are Coming for Your Job, Should They Also Pay Your Taxes?

by Rebecca S. Christie

Unlike the workers who operate it, your grocery store's self-checkout machine usually does not pay employment taxes, but the Brussels community of Molenbeek-Saint Jean is pushing for change. The municipality wants to charge supermarkets €5,600 per automated kiosk in a bid to bring in more revenue and find tax sources that do not depend solely on worker paychecks.¹

Robot workers are the stuff of science fiction,²
